The Hotel Bus

In the days of early hotels every hostelry had a bus or "hack" at the travel stations to pick up passengers as a part of the hotel service which was free to guests.

This old custom went out with the hitching post at the front gate. The free lunch at the saloon bar, and free transportation, with the jolly, gay traveling salesman or "drummer" all went along together. All three were popular treats in those days, and the "bounden" duty of drinks and food for the customer, established a reputation of the happy-go-lucky "drummer" with "a girl in every town" and an "expense account" which was provided for this "emissary of goodwill" by the company he represented.
